RADING DAY, SATURDAY.

SIX PENCE PAPERWORK.

The question is this: when there are so many Southern papers it is believed that those in the South and surely find it a great loss, either nation of books can see a fair proportion will come from the press of Southern writers. This is an important consideration.

It is a trade consideration. The same are seen, but the most important are first a book of equal merit at home, and second, the lack of it elsewhere and the poor share of Southern books which probably there from emanating in any proportion or certain business. The Southern papers as a whole could be best adapted to back tracking them there.

The North has most intelligent of them guides for every species and tendencies than for books. Professional men supply themselves with the standard authorities, and keep up with current reports but beyond these, very few of them can a great deal about either books. They take the newspapers and read much, however, and it is right that they should do so in these days of recreation and keep them always posted in the latest and rarest in the world, and it would be nice to the mind to confine itself to any one subject or branch of reading and study.

But the Southern people just now more extensive book-sellers is a misfortune to the South. No man can read any book without learning something from it, and there is nothing that a man of family can have in his house more advantageously than his children than well selected books.

This applies to the father, the mechanic and the laborer as far as to the lawyer, the doctor, the minister, or the teacher. Southern writers have really no such right to write for President and Vice President. Congress comes the children at home. The North is full of authors, and when they do write it they are encouraged. Their books will be seen in every library, in every office and in every family, and seven times in ten they will be found in Southern libraries and facilities of preference to the books of Northern authors. Northern publishers know this. They have learned it by experience, and hence they hesitate to take hold of anything Southern, and no one can blame them for it. Until the people of the South foster and encourage a Southern literature, there will hardly be anything that can appropriately bear that title. If we want a literature in the South we must build it up, and we can build it up if we give the proper encouragement to Southern writers. The North will help us when we help ourselves, and we must not expect her to do more than this. She buys more of her books than she does of ours. We do the same when if we would set upon the principle of encouraging home literature first and most liberally, we might at no distant day rank with her in the world of letters.

PEACE AND QUIET.

When we look back through the last four or five months and then take in all the surroundings of the present, we are plausibly sensible of the blessings of peace and quiet which have marked the progress of events and still prevail around us. Through the whole of the late Presidential and Congressional campaign there seemed to be a season of calm and sober reason prevailing the masses of this entire section of country. There was no bitterness, no unkindness, perceptible anywhere, and now that the elections are all over and past, Democrats and Republicans and Greenbackers meet and talk over matters in a pleasant spirit and joke each other in harmless pleasure about the wondrously mistaken calculations men sometimes make in advance about elections. And, where's the wisdom or use of doing otherwise? When a thing is done, it is past, and the better way is to make the best of it and be contented. It is more to the welfare and happiness of a community to have peace, unity and good will among all its classes and people, than to growl over the defeat of this candidate or the election of that, and we consider it a cheering omen that such a state of feeling and intercourse prevails among us at this time. May it ever be so.
